

REVIEW OF DAY 1

I want to make one thing clear right up front. I am not doing a daily review every day. However, I decided to do one today, because I have had a few questions that pertained to my health and mood rather than trading.

I have had a couple of people comment on my state of mind today. I think my voice sounded different, and they somehow came to the conclusion that I was upset or depressed or I didn't enjoy myself.

Nothing could be further from the truth. I have really looked forward to coming back to trade with you. It was my first day back, and it was also my first real day of trading all day for myself. I suppose I felt a little rusty.

I also had some issues with OBS software and Telegram, as well as my PC. It seemed they all wanted to have a software upgrade on the precise day I was back. It added a little to my sensation of not quite being in control. I am somewhat of an IT dinosaur, and I feel quite helpless when IT doesn't work.

Those pesky IT issues aside, I liked being back. It is important for me that I make sure you understand why I took a break from the channel and from trading.

I took a break from the channel because I needed to figure out how to deal with the success of the channel. I get at least 500 messages a day. Even as I type this, there are 211 messages waiting to be read, this being in spite of having already answered many more today.

I don't want to be known on my deathbed as the guy who answered all his emails and messages. I want to provide meaningful guidance and exclusive research for you to work with. I will not accomplish this if I spend all my time answering questions.

I set up the "Resource" channel to make access to my work easy. It is working. People are asking far fewer questions now than before, because they can find my work easily. I am very happy with this initiative, as I think you are as well.

While I was away, I designed a work schedule that allows me to operate the Telegram channel with 100% focus, while still answering some questions. Job done. Today has proven a success on that account. I was focused and I still managed to attend to questions without it disrupting my trading.

The other reason I took a break from the channel and from trading was because I wanted to step back from being a risk-taker for a while and assess what I wanted to achieve with my trading. The last 12 years has been a frantic pace trading wise. My trading size has grown. My profitability has grown. I have written a book, which is turning into a best-seller. There is much to be grateful for, and I am. I just haven't had an opportunity to really step back and appreciate it and reflect on what was going on in my life.

During my time away I spent time reading, researching and relaxing. I decided to not come back until I was absolutely "gagging for it", a youthful expression for really wanting it (it was 30 years ago at least).

I reached that last week. I badly wanted to trade again. Today was nevertheless a strange day. I executed the ASRS and the SRS perfectly. At one point I had about 90 points in open profit in DAX.

Are 90 points a lot of points in the DAX? Yes, I would say it is. However, I had decided that 16,000 was a level, which could be reached today in the DAX index and I was prepared to sacrifice my open profit for that goal.

90 points turned into 26 points. Yes, so it goes. The 90 points could have turned into 150 points, but it didn't. I had made that decision ahead of time. I knew the risk and I let the trade run.

It did not work out.

I was however true to my plan. So, if I sounded a little "serious" today, it was because it was my first day back. I wanted it to be a good experience for myself and for you.

I had obviously hoped for a different outcome today, but the NASDAQ did not play ball to my plan, and I made a mistake. I should have traded the short side in the weak index (the Dow) rather than the strong index. I paid for it by losing my open profit from the EU session.

Conclusion?

You can draw many conclusions I am sure, and I have learned that people will add two and two and come to twenty-two, when it comes to me. One conclusion you can't draw is that I am not enjoying trading with you. I am. I hope you are feeling the same way too.

Upwards and onwards?

Tom
