

Every evening, a golgappa (pani puri) vendor sets up his cart.

His total capital?

Just ₹10,000–15,000 worth of material.

Ask him, “Bhai, how much do you earn daily?”

He smiles and says,

“Sir... if I save ₹1,000 a day, that’s more than enough.”

That ₹1,000 is his target.

But more important than the target is his risk calculation.

He already knows:

- One day it might rain 🌧️
- Some days customers may not show up
- Prepared material gets spoiled in 1–2 days
- A certain percentage of loss is inevitable

He doesn’t come thinking,

“I must make ₹10,000 today or nothing.”

He comes thinking,

“This much loss I can afford.

This much profit is enough.

After that, I close the shop.”

Now think about this...

An intraday trader enters the market with ₹2–5 lakhs.

But does he enter thinking,

“What is my maximum loss for the day?”

Or does he enter like he’s here to gamble?

The golgappa vendor runs his business with ₹15,000 and is satisfied earning ₹1,000.

You enter with ₹5 lakhs

and lose ₹50,000

and still say,

“I’ll recover tomorrow...”

Remember this:

He runs a cart.

You’re running your life.

He closes his shop once his target is done.
You stay back because of greed.

He calculates loss first,
then thinks about profit.
You think about profit first,
and understand loss later.

The market is not a temple where you go to offer money.
It's a business.

You are not here to donate capital.
You are here to extract profit.

You should feel fear.
Fear of loss.
Fear of blowing your capital.

Because the market opens every day.
Your capital doesn't.

From tomorrow, decide:

- What is your daily maximum loss?
- What is your daily realistic target?
- And once target is done... shut the screen.

Be a shopkeeper.
Not a gambler.

The market will always be there.

The question is ... will your capital? 🔥
